class now being built, as we recently stated, on the banks of the Kelvin at Glasgow evoke much interest among yachting men in Scotland, in view of their close association with the forthcoming international race for the American Cup. One is for the Prince of Wales, another for Lord Dunraven, while a third is for a syndicate, mostly Glasgow gentlemen. A representative of Engineering had an opportunity of witnessing the casting of the keel of the syndicate cutter in Messrs. Inglis's yard at Pointhouse the other day. This huge block of lead weighs about 75 tons, and is of course moulded as an integral part of the hull of the vessel. The method of making the casting differed from that ordinarily adopted in other works. The keel was cast in one piece. The metal was melted in a furnace specially erected in the neighborhood of the building slip, so that the unwieldly mass might have to be shifted as little as possible. The temperature of the furnace was such that the lead charged at one end and ran out at the other almost immediately in a white-hot stream, and the mould, notwithstanding its great size—45 feet long by about 41 feet deep—was thus completely filled with fluid metal, ensuring a casting of great density. The framing of the yacht was all Real Estate & Collection Agency ready to be put in place as soon as the keel could be laid on the build-
